By Any Greens Necessary

Reflect

- One of Moss' central ideas is that God can work through "any means necessary" to bring about healing and transformation in the world. Describe a time where you have seen God work through an unexpected person or in an unconventional way. What were the results?
- The 20th century theologian Karl Barth once said that a Christian leader should always have the Bible in one hand and a newspaper in the other. What do you think this means and where do you see similar perspectives evident in Moss' talk?
- Near the end of his talk, Moss explains how jazz music brings together instruments intended for other uses and allows each to have the chance to solo. In your view, why is jazz an apt metaphor for what is needed to bring about community transformation?

Respond

- Moss suggests that when it comes to solving problems facing our communities, we often lack imagination more than resources. Describe a problem facing your community that needs a more imaginative approach.
- After returning to Jerusalem from exile, the Israelites rebuilt both the temple and the city walls. To what extent do you think the mission of the church today should likewise focus on community development as well as worship/spiritual formation?
- If you could choose one project in your community for your church to invest in or contribute to the development of, what would it be and why?
